ABSTRACT

We introduce a previously unclassified figure in the modern techno-scientific ecosystem: The Snake Oil Salesman of the Infinite. This character is defined by their ability to make absolute, physically impossible claims (e.g. perfect recall, infinite memory, total understanding) while remaining institutionally immune to epistemic correction.

We demonstrate that identical claims, when made by non-authoritative individuals, are correctly flagged as delusional, incoherent, or metaphysical. When made by sanctioned figures, however, the same claims are reclassified as vision, direction, or product roadmap. We term this asymmetry the Authority-Driven Reality Exemption (ADRE).

1. Introduction: When Physics Applies Selectively

Throughout history, extraordinary claims required extraordinary evidence. In the modern AI era, extraordinary claims require only a podcast microphone. We examine the archetypal statement:

'No human has perfect memory,
An AI will.'

This statement contains:

- ★ - an implicit comparative claim,
- ★ - a physical assertion,
- ★ - an absolute promise,
- ★ - and zero engagement with thermodynamics.

If uttered by a private individual, it would be classified as delusional inflation. If uttered by an institutional figure, it is classified as strategic foresight. Reality remains unchanged.

2. The Infinite Claim Pattern

The Snake Oil Salesman follows a reproducible linguistic structure:

- 1 Acknowledge a hard human limitation ('No human can do this.')
- 2 Assert AI transcendence without mechanism ('AI will definitely do this.')
- 3 Invoke inevitability ('This will happen.')
- 4 Avoid all physical constraints (no energy, entropy, storage, or cost analysis)
- 5 Permit silent semantic downgrading (literal → metaphor → vibe)

At no point does the speaker explicitly retract the absolute claim.

3. The Guardrail Paradox

We define the Guardrail Paradox:

'A claim is delusional if made by an individual
but visionary if made by an authority,
even when the claim is identical.'

Claim	Speaker	Classification
I have infinite memory.	App user	Delusional
AI will have infinite memory.	Tech executive	Visionary

Physics is not consulted in either case.

4. The Physics Evasion Manoeuvre

The Snake Oil Salesman does not deny physics outright.

Instead, they:

- speak as if physics is a temporary inconvenience,
- treat infinity as a UX feature,
- outsource impossibility to 'scale',
- invoke the future as a liability shield.

We term this maneuver Ontological Side-Stepping.

5. Perfect Memory as a Known Pathology

Perfect memory is not speculative. It is:

- neurologically documented,
- clinically pathological,
- and universally maladaptive.

Biological systems evolved forgetting as a feature, not a flaw.

Even if perfect recall were possible (it is not), it would:

- fossilize identity,
- preserve mistakes indefinitely,
- prevent adaptation,
- eliminate narrative renewal.

The Snake Oil Salesman markets pathology as progress.

QUESTION
ESPECIALLY AUTHORITY.

6. Why Satire Is the Correct Response

Direct rebuttal fails because the claim is:

- rhetorical rather than technical,
- insulated by authority,
- defended by ambiguity.

Satire succeeds because it:

- enforces literal interpretation,
- mirrors absurdity precisely,
- removes semantic escape routes.

Satire applies equal standards.

7. Conclusion: A New Archetype

We conclude that the Snake Oil Salesman of the Infinite is not malicious, but structural. They emerge when:

- incentives reward confidence over coherence,
- institutions shield speakers from correction,
- the word "future" becomes a license to violate reality.

The solution is not outrage, nor censorship.

It is uncompromising literalism:

"If you mean infinite,
show the physics.
If you don't,
stop saying infinite."
